Bodywearers

by Connie Colwell Miller

Whether Connie Colwell Miller writes of a red-tailed hawk hunting for mice or a lover's underwear crumpled up on the bedroom floor, her voice is filled with a revealing breathe of candor. Her poems draw our attention to the small details in nature and of the body, often showing us beauty where we may not have expected it, as if her narrator intimately knows the people, landscapes, and events that she speaks of.

The Prostitutes of Post Office Street

by Frank F. Carden

Post Office Street drops readers into the red-light district of Galveston, where crooked cops and down-on-their-luck prostitutes dwell. Yet, in this seedy part of town, Carden paints a picture of hope as his main characters seek to rise above the pain of broken hearts and misplaced passions, and break free from the ruts that their lives have fallen into.
